Mental Health and Well-being in Schools

The course has treated the pupil's mind as a learning machine. This one-week unit treats it as a person's life. Mental health is not a topic beside the others; it is the condition the others run on - a frightened pupil cannot risk (Unit 8's environment), an anxious one has no workbench (Unit 4), and a pupil whose attributions have closed (Unit 6's protect loop) sometimes needs more than a teaching move.

The unit holds two things at once: the school's genuine power to protect well-being, and the honest limits of a teacher's role. Both halves matter. The school that thinks it is powerless abandons pupils it could help; the teacher who thinks they are a therapist harms pupils they meant to help.

Unit learning outcomes

By the end of this unit you should be able to:

- Define mental health and well-being in WHO's framing, as more than the absence of illness.
- Name the common difficulties and their signs in school, and distinguish the teacher's response from the referral.
- Read the school day as demands and supports, and name the school-level supports that protect well-being.
- Describe the teacher's role and its limits: notice, respond within the classroom, refer beyond it - never diagnose or counsel beyond training.

Prerequisite knowledge

Units 1-10 (the whole course; especially Unit 2's emotional domain, Unit 6's emotions and anxiety, and Unit 8's positive learning environment). This unit reads the whole classroom through the well-being lens.

In this unit

1. Topic 11.1 - What mental health and well-being are, and how they show in school
2. Topic 11.2 - The school's and the teacher's role in well-being

How to use this unit

- Handle the material with the seriousness it asks for. This unit names hopelessness and despair; treat the naming as professional knowledge, not gossip.
- Keep one pupil in mind - anonymised - whose school year worried you. The unit assessment asks for exactly that pupil, read through this unit.
- Learn the referral line by heart. The boundary between the teacher's response and the referral is the unit's most consequential sentence.
- After the two topics, the unit assessment page carries a full question bank with answers and marking guidance.
